On some very basic level we all connect to nature. How we acquire this connection differs from one person to the next, but it is there. No one is such a complete urban character that the wind, the sun, the presence of greenery, and the space and shape of the landscape does not in some way impose an aesthetic degree of encounter upon them. The shape that these elements take in art is another matter altogether. Throughout human history nature has always had a role in how and what we do.
